To Dedicate House Of Judaism Soon

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations, parent body of Reform Judaism in the U.S. and Canada, will move into its new $1,000,000 headquarters at Fifth Avenue and Sixty-fifth Street, New York.

The seven-story variegated limestone structure will be known as the House of Living Judaism. It will house an audio-visual center, a small chapel, a library pertaining specifically to synagogue matters and exhibit room for ceremonial objects.

An important milestone in the rise of the Reform movement, the transfer will mark the removal of the organization's affairs from the home of its birth in Cincinnati to the East Coast. The late Rabbi Isaac Mayer Wise founded the Union in the Ohio city seventy-eight years ago.

Six affiliates will maintain offices in the new building. They are the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods, the National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods, the National Federation of Temple Youth, the Jewish Chautauqua Society, the New York Federation of Reform Synagogues and the Combined Campaign of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion.

Formal dedication services will be held for three days beginning on October 26. It is expected that several hundred delegates representing the 440 Reform congregations will be present for the occasion. In addition, most of the Union affiliates will hold executive board meetings during the three days.

Beginning on October 28, the National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods will hold its biennial convention in the building.

The new headquarters was made possible through a gift of the late

First Commerce Pact Is With U.S.

A treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation between the Governments of the United States and Israel was signed in the U.S. State Department in Washington by Secretary of State Dean Acheson and Ambassador Abba Eban. The treaty is subject to ratification by both Governments before becoming effective.

Following the ceremony, Ambassador Eban noted that this was the first treaty of its kind between Israel and any other state. "It is appropriate that this first treaty should be with the United States, which was the first Government to accord recognition to Israel," he said.

The treaty, State Department authorities explained, was similar to those concluded in recent years between the United States and several other countries including Colombia, Ireland, Uruguay, Italy, and Greece.

According to the treaty, both Governments agree to accord to citizens and corporations of the other nation within its territories treatment no less favorable than accorded its own citizens and corporations in respect to most business activities, formally endorses standards protecting persons and their property and interests, affirm principles of nondiscriminatory treatment of trade, and shipping and provide in broad terms for the judicial conditions favorable to private investment designed to promote economic development.

In a formal statement released following the signing, the State Department observed that "the treaty marks a major step in bringing toward completion with Israel the pattern of formal arrangements through which nations customarily provide for the orderly conduct of economic intercourse with one another."

The statement added that in addition to the treaty, represent-

U.S. May Cut Off DP Entry Unless Funds Voted

Edward M. O'Connor, U.S. Displaced Persons Commissioner, said that unless a $2,431,000 appropriation for continuing the work of the Commission until next June 30 was restored to a supplemental appropriations bill, further admission of International Refugee Organization displaced persons would have to be cut off. An effort will be made to restore the funds in the Senate.

Mr. O'Connor declared that the action of a House Appropriations subcommittee in dropping this item was in effect negation of an act of Congress on June 28, 1951, says the New York Times. This act extended the life of the Displaced Persons Commission for six months after its scheduled expiration date at the end of 1951 so that the Commission could complete its work of resettling the authorized number of persons.

The supplemental appropriation asked by the Commission was disallowed by the subcommittee, headed by Representative Albert Thomas, Democrat of Texas. "In the opinion of the committee the evidence given was not sufficient to justify an additional appropriation in excess of the amount to be provided in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1952," the committee reported.

Mr. O'Connor said that no part of the cost of the six-month extension had been included in the earlier Independent Offices Bill because the commission was not allowed to figure it in the regular budget. According to the law then, the commission was to expire in December. Only after Congress had extended the commission for six months could the commissioners begin to prepare their supplemental request, he said.

The $2,431,000 supplemental request was broken down as follows:

For the Commission program of bringing over individuals and families now in charge of the International Refugee Organization in Germany, Austria, and Italy, $618,000.

For Army Intelligence to study all cases to prevent admission of Communists and other undesirables, $126,000.

For the public health service, $164,000 for health inspections.

For the State Department, $392,000, covering work of personnel used on the program and also the extension of the special admission programs conducted by the department.

For the Immigration and Naturalization Service in connection with the program, $137,000.

To cover the expense of transporting to the United States 8,000 German expellees, at a cost of $125 each, $1,000,000.

When Congress first extended the Displaced Persons Commission in June, 1950, it was with the provision that 54,744 persons of German origin who had been expelled from Iron Curtain countries should be allowed admission to the country. Since these persons were ineligible to receive the benefits of the I. R. O. program, which includes transportation, Congress voted to pay their ocean transport, which was to be of the same type as that for D. P.'s.

The Special State Department programs ordered by Congress in June, 1950, which will have to expire as the money ear-marked for them runs out, Mr. O'Connor said, are for: Poles in England who fought with the British Third Army, of whom up to 18,000 were to have been admitted; Shanghai refugees now in the Philippines, of whom 4,000 were to be let in; and Greeks, of whom 75,000 were to be admitted. The special program of admitting 5,000 orphans also would be continued until the money ran out, Mr. O'Connor said.

As of June 30 of this year, just after Congress voted the further six-month extension of the Displaced Persons Program, the commission had been authorized a total of 309,000 visas, of which 266,869 had been assigned, leaving 42,331 visas still to be assigned. Being processed, as out of that time, were 41,143 cases, involving about 80,000 persons.

The State Department record as of last June 30 was 82,000 visas authorized, 13,295 unplaced, leaving [illegible] countries.

Benefactor Was World Famous For Sporting Goods

Jacob J. Golomb, head of the Everlast Sporting Goods Manufacturing Company, 26 East Fourteenth Street, New York, died of a heart ailment in University Hospital. Mr. Golomb, who would have been 59 years old on September 25, was buried in Mount Zion Cemetery in Maspeth, Queens.

Born in Riga, Latvia, he was brought to the United States as a boy. Starting in his twentieth year with $6 and a sewing machine donated by his father, he built up an enterprise that became one of the largest of its kind in the world.

His first product was boxing gloves. Eventually Mr. Golomb became more or less the leader in this specialty, and it was his boast that every American boxing champion, beginning with Jack Dempsey, has worn Golomb gloves. He later developed a special mitt for Air Force pilots for use at extreme altitudes and also devised equipment for physiotherapy treatment in Government and civilian hospitals.

Mr. Golomb, who perfected the boxers' headguard for use during training, was working on a modified version to be worn in professional contests when he died. He believed that such a device would reduce ring fatalities almost to the vanishing point. He also helped perfect the fighters' mouthpiece now in common use.

During World War II, Mr. Golomb put in a good deal of time working on the shoulder-wheel and the cycle-pedal, used extensively in the military service hospitals for the treatment of badly wounded soldiers, sailors, marines and airmen. Branch factories in Buffalo and in Allentown, Pa., worked overtime to produce such equipment when the flow of wounded was at its peak, says the New York Times.

Mr. Golomb, who rose from poverty, became interested in all manner of movements intended to help underprivileged children. He was a benefactor of several camps and settlement houses. He donated complete gymnasium equipment to Father Flanagan's Boys Town in Nebraska.

Mr. Golomb also had been active in the Police Athletic League, the Grand Street Boys Association and the Village Temple at 141 West Thirteenth Street, an edifice shared by an inter-faith group in which Mr. Golomb had been a director.

He was on intimate terms with the sporting world's great—the late George Herman (Babe) Ruth, Joe Di Maggio, Jack Dempsey, Joe Louis—and with most of the nation's leading sports writers. From 1920 to 1934, Mr. Golomb was head of the Everlast Boxing Record, a publishing firm. The late Robert (Believe It Or Not) Ripley did the Boxing Record covers.

A 7,100-feet mountain peak in Alaska had been named in Mr. Golomb's honor only last month by one of his sons, Dr. Frederick Golomb, of Bellevue Hospital, who had gone there this summer with a group from the American Geographical Society. Another son, Daniel Golomb, survives, as do three of Mr. Golomb's brothers and three sisters. His widow, Mrs. Jehanmah Loewry Golomb, lives with her sons at 26 East Ninth

REPORT ADVISES FIGHT ON BIGOTRY MORE AT LOCAL LEVEL THAN NOW

Complete reorganization of the structure and operation of six major national Jewish organizations concerned with combating anti-Semitism is recommended in a 135-page report by Dr. Robert M. MacIver, professor emeritus of political philosophy and sociology at Columbia University. The report, not yet made public but distributed to the agencies involved, has evoked criticism from the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith, both of which would lose large areas of operation if the report is finally accepted.

The American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Congress, Jewish War Veterans, Jewish Labor Committee and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the last being the central agency of Reform Jewry in the United States, are banded together to form the National Community Relations Advisory Council, reports the New York Herald Tribune. Also part of the advisory council are the Jewish community councils of various states and cities.

While each of the organizations in the advisory council has its own sphere of activity (the Jewish War Veterans, for example, deals with the problems of ex-soldiers), all are concerned with anti-Semitism and all work in their respective spheres to combat it. Consequently there is much duplication and some friction among the groups as well as competition for funds. In addition, during the last decade the community councils have contended that while they raise a large proportion of the funds, they have an inadequate voice in the programs of the national organizations.

Recognizing these problems, the National Community Relations Advisory Council executive committee appointed a group which in turn designated Dr. MacIver to make the study. The study itself, however, was only one part of a threefold program. The second was establishment of an evaluation committee to consider the study and reactions to it by the organizations involved and to report on the whole matter; the third will be a plenary session of the Advisory Council in Atlantic City, November 24 through 26.

In general Dr. MacIver's recommendations fall into three categories:

(1) To reallocate the functions among the various agencies to eliminate duplication. In this process the work being carried on by

Election Results Answer Two Questions About Israel Future

BY A. WILFRED MAY, IN THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

The results of the Parliamentary elections have importantly confirmed the answers to the two questions most frequently asked about Israel: namely, whether she is going Socialist, and whether she is going bankrupt.

The electoral gains registered by both Mapai, the party of the moderate Socialists, and by the General Zionist party of free enterprisers, highlight the inconsistencies and self-contradictions in the country's ruling ideology. The Mapai leader, Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, had been proclaiming that free enterprise entails universal bankruptcy; while the Zionist party leader, Peretz Bernstein, based Ms party's appeal to the voters on the need for a free market and curtailment of controls.

The demonstration of sizable popular support for each of these platforms and the prospect for another coalition governing arrangement make it quite certain that the multi-faced directions of the government's policies will continue unabated, and that attempts to categorize them according to orthodox definition will remain fruitless.

We see on the one hand that the majority of the land belongs to the state, that 70 per cent of the agricultural output is produced by collective or co-operative settlements, that on the collectives there is no private ownership of assets and no provision for the individual's incentive, and that through the giant labor federation, Histadrut, with a membership exceeding earners, there is a far-flung worker ownership of industry, banking, transport, publishing, distribution and building.

On the other hand, the ubiquitous roles of the predominantly labor coalition government include the most intensive efforts to encourage domestic and foreign investors of private capital. A recently enacted law for the encouragement of capital investments, administrated through a so-called investment center, offers them a variety of special privileges in the spheres of taxation, depreciation allowances, capital imports and foreign exchange unblocking.

Also seemingly paradoxical is the abstention of the Socialistically slanted regime from that keynote instrument of Socialism, the nationalization of industry. On the premise that the state's ownership of the means of production is implicit in the definition of a Socialist economy, then Israel certainly is not a Socialist state—only railroads, communications and ports being under state ownership, having been so placed during the Mandate.

But this is not the test of the prevalence of a free-market economy here; in lieu of the state, the organized workers through their giant network of federated co-operatives the Histadrut own the means of production.

And it is important that prospective foreign investors in Israel and other observers realize that there is little possibility of future doctrinaire nationalizing. This is so because here, in contrast to other countries, it would undermine labor's self-interest. Labor's continuing domination over industry is now made effective through the system of far-flung co-operative ownership, whereas under nationalizing it would be vulnerable to the electorate's ordering of changes in the government. Labor dominates already; so it neither needs nor wants more government intervention in ownership. Typically, the Histadrut has even kept the health services out of government hands.

Also growing out of labor's unique employer-employee status here is the surprising self-restraint exercised over concessions to the workers. In fact, if the realistic blackmarket prices be used as the yardstick, wages have actually lagged behind cost-of-living rises. Concessions have been granted by the Histadrut acting as employer, merely following the same political pressures under which the labor vote gets placated in the free-market democracies. Responsibility for governing seems to be a most salutary force toward constructive behavior.

In any event, in weighing the likely ideological course of Israel's economy, it must be realized that underlying the present inconsistencies and cross currents, is the nation's emergency situation of all-pervading shortages. In a setting of the most desperate shortages and rigid austerity, reflected in curtailment of incoming goods going to consumers to one-third of total imports, not even the most ardent free enterprises can advocate complete abolition of controls; while, conversely, even the most rabid doctrinaire Socialist—conforming to the Marxist principle that capitalism is a prerequisite to Socialism—sees the need for wooing private capital. During this "shotgun honeymoon" period the country is too hungry, as well as too busy, to go in for the luxury of either conscious Socializing or whole-hog capitalism.

Revelation of the country's permanent ideological direction must await freedom of choice which can be afforded only by the eventual ending of the emergency status. Meanwhile, policy must needs be directed "by ear" in an economy which is syndicalist rather than capitalist or Socialist.

Likewise must definite conclusions concerning the nation's solvency await the outcome of long-term developments. Internally, despite sizable budgetary deficits through so-called "development" expenditures and a twelve-month rise of 60 per cent in currency circulation, disaster can be avoided at home through the technique of controls. But the crux lies in the nation's external situation, where the key to ability to keep its head above water depends on gaining productivity from its present capital expenditures and immigrating labor, sufficient to eliminate the huge excess of imports over exports, now running at a ratio of 4½ to 1. The big obstacles are the enormous costs of in-gathering displaced immigrants, most of them with low productivity capacity, at the rate of 25,000 per month; and of military preparations, necessitated by the tinderbox relationship with the neighboring Arab states, costing an estimated £30 to 40 thousand per annum.

Over the short term, the balance-of-payments position in effect depends uniquely on the continuation of co-religionists' charitable contributions, and on their response to the large bond drive in America. This can be appreciated from the following estimated projection of the balance of payments items for the year 1951:

Exports	60
Shipping and Tourism	11
Sterling Releases	8
Export-Import Bank	40
Charitable Funds	70
Bond Issue	60
Non-currency Imports	65
Short-term credits.
Private Remt's etc	100
U.S. Grant-in-aid (?)	23
Total	437
Imports of Commodities	340
Shipping and Tourism	45
Debt Service	40
Total	425

But even taking a pessimistic view of the bond issue, and also assuming the absence of further export-import credits or grants-in-aid from the United States, it must be remembered that the crucial immigration cost is actually a controllable item, whose curtailment in extreme emergency supplies an ace-in-the-hole. Hence, in the absence of the re-outbreak of a Middle East shooting war, it would seem that the odds favor Israel's eventual muddling through.

ASKS MAINE TO BAR BIAS AT RESORTS

The American Jewish Congress charged that some Maine resort hotels practice discrimination and asked for corrective legislation. In a letter to Gov. Frederick S. Payne of Maine, Gerald R. Berlin, counsel for the New England office of the congress, cited brochures and letters from specific hotels as containing "latently discriminatory language." He sent photostatic copies to the Governor and urged a comprehensive public accommodations law.

Mr. Berlin contended that the offending resorts were fostering "prejudice and bigotry" and violating the basic American principle that rights of citizens must not be restricted because of race, color or religion.

Journey Through Iran Where Thousands Wait For Help

BY STANLEY ABRAMOVITCH, JOINT DISTRIBUTION COMMITTEE DIRECTOR IN IRAN

"A fire comes down from heaven." That's how the stifling heat of Persia is explained. We travel mostly at night. The morning is spent examining the children, checking the feeding and clothing programs and meeting with local community leaders. In the afternoon we sleep, usually in the basement of the community leader's house, for this is the coolest spot. In the evening we drive over primitive roads in an old car, hoping to reach the next town by daybreak.

Such a trip is not only exhausting, but often dangerous. By the third night the driver frequently becomes too worn out to remain awake. If we are not careful, we are liable to find ourselves bogged down in a muddy ditch or at the bottom of a steep ravine. This scorpion-infested community of 850 souls has an Alliance Israelite school attended by 300 children. We have one capable teacher who works devotedly. He attended the teachers seminar maintained by the Joint Distribution Committee in Teheran last year, and the guidance he gained he uses well. Nevertheless, the children still read with a local dialect. The syllabus JDC prepared and sent to the school could not be put to full use because of a lack of teachers.

A special class for girls, aged 15 and 16, meets in the evening. They speak Hebrew well and are even learning the Shulhan Aruch (compilation of laws pertaining to Jewish practice and observance). They are probably the only group of women in Iran who possess this knowledge. During the entire summer the school remained open for three hours daily, principally to provide lunch for the undernourished children. Sixty-five youngsters now have their meals in the school dining room. The kindergarten has been opened and in the year 5712 the number of boys and girls receiving lunch in the school will reach 100 daily. It is urgently necessary to increase this feeding program, since most of our young charges have no breakfast in the morning and very little supper at night.

We left Kashan for Yazd at 2:30 in the afternoon, but it was not until the next morning that we arrived at our destination. The car broke down soon after starting and we were forced to stand for three hours in the blistering sun. Of the 260 children in the Alliance school in this small primitive town, JDC provides lunch for 180. The food is so important to these boys and girls that last summer they pleaded with us to keep the dining room open even though the school was closed.

More than 200 children are wearing JDC clothing. It was interesting to note that the less destitute children come to school in worse clothes than the poorer ones. The "richer" boys and girls have a change of clothing and therefore wear their torn outfits to school, while their better garments are kept for the Sabbath. The poorer children have only the clothes we give them. Accordingly, when I see a child in rags, I know that he is not from one of the poorest families, because the poorer children are neatly dressed in JDC clothing.

Some 30 children in Yazd suffer from an aggravated form of tinea (scalp ringworm). Since local facilities in Yazd are inadequate and unreliable, I am planning immediately after Rosh Hashonah to take the children in groups to Isfahan, where a JDC doctor will provide X-ray treatment.

We left Yazd to travel south across the desert of Lot to Kerman, on the border of Pakistan. The poverty in small communities such as Kerman is unbelievable. Of the 55 children we feed in the school dining room, not one of them has any breakfast before coming to school. Boys and girls devour the food greedily. They are still thin and underweight, but already I can see improvement in terms of increased energy and vitality. In addition, after months of training, they have learned to wash their hands before sitting down to lunch. But we shall have to increase the number of children we feed in Kerman.

The one school in the town is an Ozar Hatorah institution with five classes. The teachers, working according to instructions we send them and under the guidance of a director who attended the JDC's teachers seminar in Teheran last year, have been unusually successful with their students. In the lower grades, however, progress is slower because so many of the children have come from non-Jewish schools.

We left Kerman and reached Isfahan, 500 miles away, 17 hours later. Just a short time ago I had been in Isfahan to establish a child-feeding program, and my first and most important task in this town was to see what had been accomplished. The food was not what it should have been and the local community leaders responsible for the program promised to make certain specific improvements. I then applied for a permit to go on to Shiraz. Every time I have to visit a provincial town like Shiraz, I must obtain a special permit. Shiraz is out of bounds and does not honor my British passport. Permit in hand, we left Isfahan and reached Shiraz, 200 miles away, exactly twelve hours later. The reason for the delay was that we were stopped on the road and advised to wait until dawn, as bandits were about that night.

Some 700 boys attend the Jewish school in Shiraz under the guidance of one of our staff members, Israel Szyf, of Jerusalem. Mr. Szyf has already spent seven months in Shiraz. The loneliness in which he lives in this remote outpost, the complete lack of basic living conditions, make his work a task of love, if not martyrdom. I consider it a miracle that, in spite of the dirt, squalor and primitive living conditions, he has been able to work so successfully and accomplish so much. Chiefly because of Mr. Szyf's efforts, the 700 children in the school did such excellent work that the Iranian education office commented favorably on their showing in their examinations. It must be remembered, too, that these youngsters come from the poorest part of the community, where not even correct Persian is spoken. Their native tongue is a local Jewish dialect, a combination of ancient Persian and corrupted Hebrew.

Five hundred of the children receive their only daily meals at the school, but many more need JDC's hot nourishing luncheons, morning and mid-day snacks. JDC also provided clothing for 600 children. Even some of the teachers were outfitted. And many more need clothing, for I was ashamed to see the ragged condition of some of the teachers in the school. A truly great achievement is the running water which JDC brought into Shiraz, a rare luxury in rural Iran. Before eating, each child is given soap and a towel with his name embroidered on it, and washing is becoming a regular ritual. We also bought clippers and disinfecting lamps, so that each child may have a regular haircut. I was delighted to see that heads which were shockingly unkempt and disheveled just a few months ago, are now neat, tidy, and clean. A group of local medical students has offered to assist in running a school clinic. Two local physicians have also offered their services. I am now corralling the necessary equipment for what I hope will be the beginning of a regular medical program.

Zarghan is a typical small Jewish community in the Iranian hinterland. The 40 boys in the local Jewish school are taught by a teacher with a stick, which he uses. Nevertheless, the boys have learned to read and know a little history. The girls grow up in complete ignorance. They attend no school and cannot read or write. One of the tragedies in this section is that many of them marry and become mothers before they can master the simple art of reading. We feed about 60 Jewish children and clothe about 80 in Zarghan. But at least the kids in this primitive, almost destitute community, are getting some decent nourishment.

We left for Teheran. Everybody had warned us that the first 90 miles were dangerous at night. The driver was frightened out of his wits. The slightest light in the distance threw him into fits of fear, but we were lucky. Nothing happened and we traveled through the night, reaching Teheran the next afternoon. It was a great satisfaction that I was able to cover nearly 2500 miles and survey the work of the JDC in so many communities.

Summing up what I saw on this trip through rural Iran, it is evident that much has been accomplished in the short two years since JDC started its welfare program in this primitive Near Eastern land. For 2,000 undernourished children who are fed and clothed and given educational opportunities, there has been a real improvement. But it must be admitted that, weighed in the light of overwhelming need, we have barely scratched the surface. There are today thousands of needy Jewish children whom we have not reached and cannot reach with our limited funds.

If the Jews of America could make the trip to Kashan, Yazd, Kerman, Isfahan and Shiraz, they would understand the size and scope of Jewish need. If they could see the squalor, destitution, ignorance and disease, there would be such an outpouring of funds to the UJA, that at long last, after centuries of destitution, Iran's Jews would have their chance.

An agreement has been reached between Israel and the French Government Tourist Office for the exchange of tourists. It will affect 250 persons from each country. The scheme will be open to all Israelis who have not been abroad since the establishment of the State. Persons are to register with the Government Tourist Office and the 250 names will be selected by lot. The holiday includes first-class passage in a Shoham ship to Marseilles and back, a seven-day stay in Paris, including sightseeing tours in the city and vicinity and entertainment. The participants will receive five Israel pounds ($14.) in foreign currency, as they will be able to pay for everything in advance.

Arthur Ruskies, son of Mr. and Mrs. D. Ruskies, 434 Prince Albert Avenue, Montreal, was elected national president of the Intercollegiate Zionist Federation of America, at a convention held near Pittsburgh, Pa. Mr. Ruskies, a graduate of McGill University, and a student at the Philadelphia Textile Institute, represented the Federation in Israel this summer; and attended World Zionist Congress sessions in Jerusalem. Beginning this fall, he will be in charge of the national offices in New York; and plans to visit each of the one hundred chapters throughout the United States and Canada.

Jewish Labor Committee assume a similar role where labor groups are concerned. These recommendations would reduce the functions of the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League.

The Union of American Hebrew Congregations was suggested as the agency to carry on interfaith work, but a proviso was suggested that since the Union is a Reform body, the Orthodox and Conservative viewpoints also be represented. That fact-finding, legal work, research and similar programs be divided by agreement among the agencies. Finally, that local community councils have primacy in conducting work in their communities, with representatives of national agencies functioning largely to supply information and assistance. On financing, Dr. MacIver proposed a change in the present structure. Most community councils raise money and allocate part of it to various national agencies in any proportion they like. Dr. MacIver recommended that communities raise money and allocate a sum for defense (against bigotry) work. This would go to a new national committee which would in turn apportion the money it collected from local communities to national organizations in the ratio it deemed best.

The Anti-Defamation League, on the other hand, has sent to its national and local board members a communication describing the MacIver report as "not a survey but a rationalization of the position of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds, and its leadership group, the Large City Budgeting Conference."

The League criticized the report for minimizing ideological differences among the various groups and said the report reflects Dr. MacIver's unfamiliarity with Jewish life, according to the New York Herald Tribune. In answering Dr. MacIver's criticism of "separatist" attitudes in Jewish life the League said it "is more revealing of his own attitudes than it is of Jewish life."

The American Jewish Committee, in a memorandum sent to its members by Jacob Blaustein, president, asserted that Dr. MacIver failed to recognize the different philosophies underlying the various organizations. The American Jewish Committee, the critique said, is not merely another operator in the field of community relations, but a vehicle in that field of a movement in Jewish life.

the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League would be sharply cut.

(2) To transform the Advisory Council, hitherto almost powerless since the various agencies were autonomous, into a major policy organization which would allocate work to the various agencies and co-ordinate the results.

(3) To revise both the financial and operational structure to give greater control to local community councils. To a greater degree the fight on bigotry would be conducted at a local level, with the national organization supplying materials and ammunition.

Dr. MacIver criticised what he described as separatist and "insulationist" tendencies on the part of some elements in the Jewish community. He suggested that where possible the work of combating intolerance be carried on by interreligious agencies rather than by those purely Jewish.

Dr. MacIver's recommendations included:

That the Jewish War Veterans undertake all work in connection with Jewish problems in so far as it relates to veterans, and that the

Dr. Albert A. Berg, surgeon and philanthropist, and by funds raised by the National Federation of Temple Sisterhoods. The move from Cincinnati to New York fulfills a mandate laid down in Boston in 1948 at the biennial assembly of the Union.

To many Reform Jews in Cincinnati, the Union's departure represents a spiritual and sentimental as well as a physical loss. Many of them and their families found in the Union one of their principal spiritual activities. Henceforth the organization's principal activities in Cincinnati will revolve around the Hebrew Union College, a regional office of the Union, the Isaac M. Wise Temple and the Rockdale Avenue Temple.

According to its architect, Harry M. Prince, the House of Living Judaism is "modern in spirit, yet enriched by traditional Jewish symbolism." Its philosophy is etched deep in limestone facades fronting on Fifth Avenue and Sixty-fifth Street: "Love Thy Neighbor as Thyself," and "Do Justly, Love Mercy, Walk Humbly with Thy God."

atives of the two Governments currently were engaged in technical discussions over the possibility of eliminating double taxation, reports the New York Times. It was explained that this would apply primarily to United States business established in Israel that, under the agreement, would not be taxed in both countries.

Mr. Eban said that the treaty signed was "further welcome evidence of the increasingly cordial relations between the two democracies." "I do not doubt that this will be a base for future collaboration," he added.

On the same day Truman Forest, named after the United States President, was dedicated in the Judean hills. The project was sponsored by the Mizrachi Women's Organization of America. United States Ambassador Monnett B. Davis attended the ceremony.

In a message, President Weizmann said: "The unfailing friendship of the President of the United States for Israel and his distinguished personality have won for him the highest honor by the State of Israel and the planting of a forest in his name."

Honors Parents With Hall At Hebrew U

A memorial trust fund approximately $42,000 for the erection of a lecture hall in the Humanities Building of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has been established by Mrs. R. Statnigros, of Hove, England, to honor her late parents, David and Penina Golomb. Israel's only accredited school of advanced learning, will not only carry David Golomb's many publications on its shelves, but is to bear a permanent memorial to his name.

David Golomb, who was a Talmudic scholar of true erudition, belonged to that category of scholar-businessman whose disappearance in recent years constitutes one of the major losses in modern Jewish life. An important feature to which is attributed much of the glory of the Jewish past was the fact that Scholarship was not confined to a limited circle of professionals as it is today. The span of Jewish history has been noteworthy for men who were outstanding figures in the world of commerce and politics while simultaneously making substantial contributions to the realm of Jewish life and letters. A distinguished example of this was the late David Golomb who left behind him many weighty volumes of lasting significance in the field of Jewish literature.

His wanderings are somewhat typical of the development of Jewish life during the last half-century. Born in Eastern Europe where he received an intensive Jewish education, he distinguished himself even as a youngster by his mastery of the multifarious fields of Jewish knowledge ranging from Bible and Talmud on to the early manifestations of the rebirth of modern Hebrew. He then turned to matters of business which took him on an odyssey of the great European centres of learning where the best in Jewish scholarship, both old and new, freely intermingled. In Odessa, for example, he struck up an acquaintanceship with Bialik, the poet laureate of modern Hebrew literature. With the advent of the Bolshevik Revolution, Mr. Golomb settled in Berlin where a good deal of his time was devoted to Biblical and Talmudic research, and writing his findings on the general development of the Hebrew language.

The rise of Nazism in Germany found him moving on once more and for the last time. His final years were spent as a citizen of the Western World in Hove, England, publishing his voluminous writings which today almost constitute a library in themselves. In many ways David Golomb evinced in his life the finest qualities of the Jewish scholar of the generation. He was the most modest of men who was rightly called "a living encyclopedia". Much of his scholastic pursuits were given over to a rather obscure field of Jewish studies not widely followed — The Targumin — Aramic translations and commentaries on the Bible which he sought to prove had considerable influence upon Jewish thinking.

U.S. MIZRACHI GETS GRANT OF LAND FOR COLLEGE IN ISRAEL

Thirty acres of land in a Tel Aviv suburb, the site of the projected Bar-Ilan University, were granted to the Mizrachi Organization of America, sponsors of the $5,000,000 project. The formal transfer was made in Jerusalem by Dr. Abraham Granott, chairman of the Jewish National Fund board of directors, to Pinchas Churgin, president of the Mizrachi Organization.

The university, which will bear the name of Rabbi Meir Bar-Ilan (formerly Meir Berlin) a veteran Zionist and founder of the Mizrachi movement, is scheduled to be opened in 1953. The institution will offer two years of college at first and then progressively develop the full status of a university, according to the plans. While the school will have a religious atmosphere and an appreciable part of the curriculum will be devoted to religious subjects, the institution is not planned as a theological school.

Emphasis will be placed on the applied sciences, and a main purpose will be to train religious young people for government and city positions and for teaching.

The only university in Israel today is the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. There has been some friction in the past few years between the faculty and some rabbinical leaders in Jerusalem who objected to the Bible criticism taught there that conflicts with orthodox teachings.

GETS AWARD TO DO RESEARCH IN TURKEY

Dr. Samuel Noah Kramer, Professor of Assyriology at the University of Pennsylvania, has received a Fulbright award for research in Turkey on ancient Sumerian writings, and will go to Istanbul, where the award, made by the United States Educational Commission in Turkey, will enable him to devote nine months to translating and restoring Sumerian clay tablets and fragments inscribed in cuneiform writing, dating back 4,000 years.

The U. of Pennsylvania's Museum, of which Dr. Kramer is curator of the tablet collections, and the museum in Istanbul each possess more than 1,000 Sumerian tablets and fragments, all of which were unearthed at the ancient site of Nippur by a U. of P. expedition fifty years ago.

One of the most interesting groups of documents of the literary collection from Nippur, situated 100 miles south of the modern city of Baghdad, is said to be the so-called "wisdom" compositions. These include proverbs, fables and assorted essays varying in subject matter from life in the Sumerian school to a farmer's "handbook" containing instructions on agricultural techniques.

The thirteenth volume of the "Dictionary of the Hebrew Language," compiled by the late Eliezer ben Yehuda, known as the "Father of Modern Hebrew," has just been published. This latest volume of the most complete Hebrew lexicon has been dedicated to the President of the United States, Harry S. Truman.

The Spiritual Inheritance Of Europe

The following statement was issued by the Religious Bodies Consultative Committee to which representatives are appointed by the Anglican and Free Churches, through the British Council of Churches, and by the Roman Catholic and Jewish authorities. The purpose of this Committee is to promote consultation and co-operation in the field of international affairs. In publishing this statement the Religious Bodies Consultative Committee wished to make it clear that the authorities of the various bodies concerned have not been asked to endorse it as if it were a pronouncement of ecclesiastical authorities or of the British Council of Churches. Each authority acting independently would probably have drawn up a statement different in some respects. The present statement has been prepared jointly by Anglican, Roman Catholic, Free Church and Jewish members of the committee and is issued as an agreed statement in the hope that it will stimulate discussion and thus be a contribution to a situation of great importance and urgency:

The outstanding contribution which Europe has made to the world is found in the following ideals which it has emphasized in spite of shortcomings in practice.

First, human personality is sacred. Each individual has a claim to respect and care, which means that he must be treated as an end in himself. Because of the dignity attached to man every man is entitled to the rights which are indicated in the phrase "rights to life, freedom and security."

Justice, Freedom and Love: On this the organization and administration of justice in law have arisen. If justice is so maintained as to ensure the individual of his just rights and to protect him from sheer power, it is a guarantee of freedom. Law and freedom go together. Freedom to be himself is the right of personality; the rights of others prevent the anarchical use of freedom. The administration of justice points to and is guided by the sense of a higher order. The earthly tribunal implies a heavenly. Historically this concept derives from religious belief on the one hand and from Greco-Roman philosophy on the other. But wherever justice demands that the obligations of law be fulfilled, the obligations of love of one's neighbour, which is an inclusive concept, are never complete.

Truth also, like justice and love, belongs to this higher order —the conviction that there are facts of the universe independent of man's hope and fears, which he must acquire only by submitting himself to them, facts in the material sphere, facts in the nature of man, facts in ultimate reality. Truth is an absolute. Respect for truth is the cement that holds society together; the plighted word is a bond.

With the rights which men derive from the sanctity of human personality go duties. Those who seek to maintain truth and justice, those who would love their neighbours, must accept obligations which imply a belief in the moral freedom of the human spirit and reject absolute determinism. The spirit of man has power to choose.

Human Dependence: European culture, while it imparts a sense of dignity to man, no less impresses upon him the limitations of his condition. Because he has a sense of truth and justice he is encouraged to strive for ideal solutions for the problems which human life presents. Because he knows he is not self-caused he does not suppose that he has the capacity to produce by himself a perfect state of things. He needs for himself the exercise of pity, and is capable of perversion. Man does not easily love his neighbour nor does he readily persist in love. But truth and justice, love and freedom, have eternal value and if man is to be true to himself they must be his guide and goal. He must recognise that this world is transitory; in it these demands can only be imperfectly achieved, but those who seek here to obey the will of God are partakers of eternity.

The Rule of God: The ethical outlook here summarised has grown up gradually in Europe and the Near East over a period of nearly four thousand years. It has been embodied in religious institutions and legal and political systems which were themselves rooted in the fundamental belief that man is the creation of a Supreme Power, the Author, the Judge, and if he will have it so, the Saviour of his being. Deeply embedded in the Greco-Roman tradition lies the warning against hubris, (Contempt). The Bible goes deeper still in its picture of God, the Creator and Ruler of mankind, the Guide and inspiration of His people, whose Will is the law and strength of man's being. On this fact reposes the conviction that every man, whatever his racial or social origin, is potentially a son of God made in His image. The greatest mistake that man can make, and one that brings in its train complete disaster, is the refusal to recognise the Divine demand for his obedience and allegiance. The tragedy of this mistake must be measured in the light of the certainty of a Final Judgment, alike on each individual and on the whole of human history.

Divine Judgment: What we have here described as the characteristics of European civilisation have, of course, never been completely achieved. Indeed, they have often been denied or betrayed. But, in so far as this has happened, European civilisation has failed to be true to its best nature. In so doing, the peoples of Europe have called upon themselves divine judgment, and have evoked the visitation of forces that seek progress by means which blatantly ignore or obstruct freedom, truth and justice.

The Menace of Materialism: To-day we face the total rejection of the whole body of belief and practice painfully built up through the ages by European civilisation. It cannot be denied that there exists a passionate effort to destroy the institutions built upon these beliefs and to set in their place a new world order, wholly materialistic in conception, denying the spiritual nature of man, despising absolute morality, and relying on violence alone for its complete justification.

Here is an urgent challenge to a more vital and intelligent religious faith, and a determination to maintain the institutions which embody it.

The above statement was signed by the following members of the Committee: Anglican: Very Rev. A. S. Duncan-Jones, Very Rev. E. N. Porter Goff, Rev. F. W. T. Craske, Rev. P. McLaughlin. Baptist: Rev. Dr. T. G. Dunning. Methodist: Rev. E. C. Urwin. Presbyterian: Rev. J. Fraser. Quaker: R. Davis. Roman Catholic: Very Rev. J. Dockery, O.F.M.; Rev. J. Murray, S.J.; Jewish: Rabbi I. Livingstone, Rabbi I. I. Mattuck, of London, England.

It was sent to the Canadian Jewish Review by Watson Kirkonnell, president of Acadia University, in Wolfville, N. S.
